

rednote

Community Activation Intern · London

How I'd bring 100 London creators onto rednote

A one-month plan.

Yihan (Eve) Yang · yueeve69@163.com

The month, roughly

Week 1

Get the first few yeses, finish the starter guide, and book a space for the workshop.

Week 2

Reach out wider through referrals and creator circles. Start helping people set up.

Week 3

Run the workshop. Help a batch of creators post their first notes.

Week 4

Bring on the rest, and check what's working — how many joined, and how many actually posted.

The goal by the end: 100 creators on rednote, most of them having posted at least once, and a small community that keeps it going.

Tell them why to join rednote

1 A huge audience you can't reach anywhere else

Hundreds of millions of people in China can't use Instagram or TikTok — they're blocked. A lot of them are on rednote, actively searching for London: students coming to study, tourists, people into UK fashion, coffee and food. And right now there's barely any good English London content there for them.

2 You can still grow — and claim your spot early

On IG and TikTok, small accounts barely grow anymore. rednote runs on search, so one good post keeps getting found for months and small accounts still take off. Get in now and you can be “the London coffee girl” or “the London outfits person” before the space fills up.

3 It's almost no extra work

You don't make anything new. rednote is photos and text, just like Instagram — you just repost your best stuff. And I give you a simple guide so you're not figuring out a new app on your own.

How I'd do it

Six steps, spread over the four weeks.

1 Start with a few sure things

I get 5 - 8 creators I can actually reach on board first for one good result I can point to.

2 Make joining a 20-minute job

One simple starter guide: set up your account, repost your best content, post your first note just by following along.

3 Help the first post land

I check tags and timing, and try to get the first few a little reach. A first post doing well is what makes people stay.

4 Grow through referrals & creator circles

Happy creators bring a couple of friends. I also go where creators already are — food and coffee scenes, student creators at KCL, LSE, UCL.

5 Run one small workshop

15–25 people set up and post their first note together, with a creator who's already doing well sharing how.

6 Keep them around

A small creators group, regular check-ins, and shouting out posts that do well — so it feels like a community, not a sign-up.

The starter guide that makes it doable

I can't personally hand-hold 100 people. But I can write one simple guide once, and everyone uses it.

The whole point: make starting on rednote something you follow along with in 20 minutes — not a new project to figure out.

What's inside

- 1 Set up your account in 3 minutes
- 2 Move your existing content over you don't have to make anything new
- 3 A fill-in-the-blank post template: title, layout, and the tags that get you found (rednote runs on search)
- 4 What to post first — a few easy options, with real London examples
- 5 Quick do's and don'ts: best time to post, what to expect in week one

One small workshop

15–25 creators, a coffee-shop

What happens

- Everyone sets up their account on the spot, using the guide.
- Everyone posts their first note before they leave.
- A creator who's already doing well on rednote shares what's worked for them.

Why it works

It kills the “I'll get to it later” problem — people walk out already set up and posting. It's recruiting, set-up help, and the start of the community, all in one afternoon.

I've run on-the-ground events before — handling logistics, materials and run-of-show for a 300-person activation — so a session this size is well within what I can pull off.

I'd start with a few bigger names

Getting even one of them to join makes everyone else take it seriously.

@the_lazyfoodie

Christy Lam 267K

Beautiful London restaurant and dessert spots. Her feed already looks like rednote, and being East-Asian she'd connect naturally with the audience there.

@londoncoffeeshops

London & Beyond 253K

The go-to guide for where to eat, stay and go in London — exactly the kind of thing people search for on rednote.

@miarose_mcgrath

Mia McGrath 282K

Fashion mixed with money advice (her “Frugal Chic” was in Vogue). Useful, save-worthy content, and a creator other creators look up to.

Then the mid-sized creators — the real core

Big enough to matter, small enough to actually say yes.

@london__foodie

London Foodie 12.5K

Food from all over the world in London — Thai, Chinese, Turkish. Honest recommendations, and an easy yes to get.

@agathesnalune

Agathe 58.2K

A French girl in London doing wellness and lifestyle. She also coaches people on making content, so she could bring her followers along to create too.

@leiaa_ku

Leia 12.4K

Malaysian-British “amateur fashion bestie” with relatable styling tips — the save-worthy stuff that does well on rednote.

@_withsof

Sof 12K (24K on TikTok)

London food, daily life and fitness — exactly the food, cafe and lifestyle mix rednote is built on.

And some smaller, niche creators

Exactly the everyday creators rednote is good at growing from scratch.

@rach.is.hungry

Rachel 2.2K

London food and dessert reviews with fun series like “Cookie Crawl.” Down-to-earth and very local — turns straight into rednote posts.

@coffeeshelikes

Serra Uner 330

Just coffee — reviews and a map of London cafes. Small, but exactly the focused everyday creator rednote can grow from scratch.

@arinaalmakaeva

Arina 1.6K

London and Marbella lifestyle — outfits, recipes, yoga, travel. Still small, which is the point: you don't need a big following to start.

rednote

London is full of people already making great content.

They just don't know there's a huge audience waiting for it on rednote. My job is to make starting easy enough that they actually do, and to make it feel like a community once they're in.

Yihan (Eve) Yang · yueeve69@163.com · +44 7436 445151